BOOK III—THE YEAR THREE.

CHAPTER XXIII—Continued.

As usual Roselin had been telling her stories, and was now rubbing in the reasons to be drawn therefrom. Her voice had a fuller note in it, or closer acquaintance made more distinguishable to his ears.

"And so, you see," he heard, in the hazy tones, like a voice from the past, the reasons to be drawn therefrom. Her voice had a fuller note in it, or closer acquaintance made more distinguishable to his ears.

"And so, you see," he heard, in the hazy tones, like a voice from the past, the reasons to be drawn therefrom. Her voice had a fuller note in it, or closer acquaintance made more distinguishable to his ears.

As before, half of them scrambled to their feet to run, and half to stand on their feet to see what was the matter. Roselin slipped down from her rock and turned quickly. And Home jumped down and ran towards her, and caught her by the face and eyes the look that was dear to him.

She made no attempt to conceal her joy at sight of him. With both hands outstretched and eyes and face alight, she came running up to meet him.

"I am very glad indeed to see you," she said, in remarkably good English, which was a surprise also and Katherine had kept for him.

"Ah-ha! So we speak English now! That is very pleasant to hear. And we speak it very well too, for he took the little brown hands and held them for a moment. 'How have you managed that so quickly?'

"It was Katherine who made me speak, and now we speak it much at home. You like it?"

"I like it very much indeed, and I must thank Katherine. He never said a word about it."

"No, it was to be secret until you came. How is Mrs. Oramore?"

"She is quite well, and she begged me to give you her warmest remembrance. She cannot get away yet. And how is everybody here, Nettie Vail, why don't you come and give me a kiss?"

And Nettie came forward with a very red face, dragging the handkerchief from her pocket and kissed her, and her face burned redder than ever. So few people kissed her.

"This is Antonio, Herr," she said abruptly.

"He is blind." "It is my business, to try and cure the blind," he said, before she could answer, and gently turning his face up so that he could observe her eyes. "You would like to see, little Antonio?"

"Ja, mein Herr. More than anything in the world I would like to see like other people."

"We must see what can be done."

"I hoped your good heart would think so good a thing," said Roselin, with hopefully clasped hands, and a relapse into the more accustomed tongue. But little Nettie's face had a startled look on it.

"My good heart is grateful to you for so good a thought. I will examine him to-morrow. And this must be done. He is blind, turning to the pretty girl who had been circling closer and closer in the hope of attracting his attention."

"Yes, Antonette Stern, Antonio's sister," said Roselin quietly, and Antonette smiled and nodded, and looked her prettiest.

He greeted the other shy ones who had been hovering about, and they all went down the hill together, he and Roselin talking. Little Vail clinging to his other hand, and hailing Antonio alone as carefully as she could. Antonette, skipping easily in front with a quick backward glance now and again to see if she was being sufficiently noticed, and lavishing attention on Herr, who received them with indifference, the rest streaming behind.

"She is very pretty," said Roselin disapprovingly, but she is also very vain. Her mother has spoiled her prettiness."

"You must try to unspoil her."

"I do, but it is not easy, for you see, she really is pretty, and she looks so well."

"And where are your father and the boys to-day?"

"They are up Grand Cornet with three very learned professors from Göttingen. I do hope they know more about some things than they do about climbing."

"Not up to much, eh?"

"I do not think they will get to the top on their legs. They might perhaps do it on their hands since they are so very clever."

"And everything has gone well? You have had no accidents lately, and no one has died?"

"No accidents at all, and no one has died. You saw the new house?" It is for my aunt and Uncle Stern to live in. The value is not so suiting them. He is a great work-carrier."

"He and Louis will get on together. Is the big piglet finished?"

"Not yet finished. The last that Louis has done is to make it, she said, dropping her voice, that makes it all and about the little one here. Uncle Stern could have taught him all he knows, and his hands are very clever and sensitive. If he had his hands he might become a wonderful carver also."

"It would be a great joy to help him to that."

"As they turned into the village street, Luigi Vail was just going into his house. He stopped and stared back at them in the distance, and Helme waved his hand in greeting. But, with a wail, Luigi lumped his shoulders and went in. Little Nettie's face quivered and reddened."

"There is no change there, at all events," said Helme quietly.

"I am ashamed for him," murmured Roselin, so that Nettie should not hear. "He is trouble to us all. You will not go climbing with him this time?" with visible anxiety.

"No, I don't think I'll go climbing with him. That last time was enough."

"I think he fears you ill-will because it made him look foolish. All the time, if you had never come back that time, I should always have thought it was his fault. It was not of course, not in the very slightest."

"I know, but all the same. They have sought and sought for the place you got in, but they could not find it."

"Just as well, perhaps. The next man might not be so fortunate in getting on."

"It was horrible," said Roselin, with a shiver. "Suppose you had never come out. It should have come out sooner or later. Fifty years from now you'd probably have found me coming out at the foot of the glacier."

"I would not," said Roselin emphatically. "Well, now, tell me where I'm to go this time with your father and the boys. They tell me of the various climaxes."

"I know, but all the same. They have sought and sought for the place you got in, but they could not find it."

LAW REPORT.

CRIMINAL APPEAL COURT.

(Before Mr. Justice Pring.)

MOTIONS FOR LEAVE TO APPEAL.

Mr. Ryan, instructed by the Crown Solicitor, appeared for the Crown. Prisoner, who was not now represented, was sentenced at the Mainland Quarter Sessions to three years' imprisonment with hard labour for assault with intent, and he now asked for leave to appeal against his sentence.

Application refused.

Rev. v. John Terrett.

Prisoner was tried at the Newcastle Quarter Sessions, and pleaded guilty to two charges of breaking and entering a dwelling house, and stealing therein. On each charge of the first two charges he was sentenced to four years' imprisonment, but the sentences on the other charges were commuted, with the first. He now appealed on the ground that the sentences were excessive.

His Honor said that having looked carefully through the papers he was of opinion that the sentences were not too severe. The offences to which prisoner had pleaded guilty had become too frequent, and the sentences awarded in such cases were intended not only as a punishment to the offender, but as a deterrent to others similarly disposed. Application refused.

Rev. v. Albert Watson.

Prisoner was convicted at the Newcastle Quarter Sessions, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. He was also convicted of larceny, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. He now appealed for leave to appeal.

Application refused.

LONDON, Dec. 15. Mr. Chester Jones, the magistrate who is inquiring into the case of driver Knox, is reporting that the evidence on the question of tuberculosis is contradictory to that of the police.

Mr. Chester Jones found that Knox was a healthy man, and that he was not suffering from tuberculosis.

The strike has been settled, and Knox has been reinstated.

The men who were employed during the strike have been compensated in full.

The strikers are dissatisfied with the terms of the settlement, and are threatening to resume work.

OTTAWA, Dec. 15. The Conservative press criticizes Sir Wilfrid Laurier's proposed naval policy.
